Frederick Douglass

In the Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass, his goal was to become a freed man so that he could help other enslaved people. His story is about the slavery, journalism, and the abolitionist movement. His ultimate goal was to free every slave in the United States. Therefore, he learned to read and write. He also became an anti-slavery advocate, and he wrote books about the evils of slavery.

Douglass worked as a slave during his youth. Once he attempted to escape slavery, but he failed. Later, he successfully escaped slavery, married and began his family life. He also began making speeches and telling people about slavery. Some people did not want him to protest slavery. Therefore, he left the United States and went to England, where he could be a freed man. When he returned to the US he started protesting slavery and eventually became a journalist.

Douglass's life as a journalist was difficult. He moved about giving speeches. He also published books. He supported four children and his wife. He also toured the United States and gave anti-slavery speeches. He became well-known throughout the United States and England.

Frederick Douglass eventually became an abolitionist. He wanted to help people understand slavery. He also wanted to be a successful liberator. However, pro-slavery advocates did not like him. Some people wanted to kill him. When he expired, he was laid in state at the nation's capital in Washington, D.C.

In conclusion, Douglass was a hero throughout the world. He gave anti-slavery speeches, he wrote newspaper articles, and he wrote several books. His life story inspired me. He probably inspired other people, like Martin Luther King Jr. and Malcolm X. Why did Frederick Douglass choose to become a journalist? I like the idea that he had the courage to do everything he could to achieve his goals, and that he did not let anyone or anything hold him back. His voice spoke for peace and justice for everyone.
